Kinship and Family in the North-East
Editor : J.S. Bhandari

This is one of the most important books to appear on kinship in recent times. Altogether it presents a most complete ethnographic as well as theoretical treatise on the variations of kinship systems in an ethnographically fascinating region, the North-East India, comprising of seven States.

This is the region based upon a horticultural economy which are those primarily organised around kinship, especially the principles of lineage. All forms of lineage organisation are present here and represented in this volume including patrilineal, matrilineal and double unilineal types.

Although, in the past one hundred years, a large body of anthropological research studies about the people of North-East have been brought out, it is difficult to find the literature on one theme in an easily accessible volume a void now commendably filled.

In these volumes, a large number of Tribes have been represented. Some are much studied like Purums and the Khasis. The others include some relatively unknown and unstudied tribes including the Mishing.
